Sasso Guerrero & Henderlite Introduces Educational Guidance from a Florida Child Support Attorney

August 11, 2026

JACKSONVILLE, FL - August 11, 2026 -
Sasso Guerrero & Henderlite, a family and criminal law firm based in Jacksonville, has introduced a new educational effort aimed at helping parents better understand the role child support plays in Florida family law matters. The initiative is designed to clarify general considerations that often arise when families address the financial needs of their children.

Child support remains one of the most common components of family law cases across the state. It is intended to help meet a child's financial needs regardless of whether the parents were ever married. Because every family situation differs, outcomes can vary considerably from one case to the next.

Under Florida law, child support is generally determined using statutory guidelines while recognizing that individual circumstances can affect the final result. These guidelines take into account a range of factors rather than applying a single fixed amount to every family.

Among the factors that may influence a determination are each parent's income, the amount of parenting time shared between households, health insurance costs, daycare expenses, and other child-related considerations. The firm's child support services focus on helping parents understand how these elements fit together within the broader legal process.

Child support may help address a variety of everyday expenses connected to raising a child. These can include housing, food, clothing, healthcare, education, and other needs that arise as a child grows. The goal is to support a child's stability and well-being over time.

The firm also notes that circumstances change. Shifts in income, adjustments to parenting time, or changes in a child's needs may lead to future modifications when appropriate conditions are met. Understanding this possibility early can help parents plan for the years ahead.

"Many parents come to a family law matter without a clear picture of how child support actually works in Florida," said Jay Henderlite, a Board Certified Marital and Family Law attorney and managing partner at Sasso Guerrero & Henderlite. "When parents understand the general framework early, they are better positioned to make informed decisions throughout their case."

Henderlite added that education is central to the firm's approach. "A child support determination reflects the specific circumstances of each family. Our aim is to help parents understand the considerations involved so that the focus stays where it belongs, which is on the child's needs and stability."

As part of its ongoing educational outreach, the firm also produces the podcast When Split Happens, which explores family law topics in accessible terms for parents navigating separation and related matters. The program complements the firm's broader commitment to providing resources that help families better understand the legal process.
